Abstract

The data for the KDD Cup 2011 competition are drawn from a real-world set of popular music reviews. Included in the data is an “item taxonomy”, which describes the relationship between four musical item types (artists, albums, tracks, and genres). To protect the data, item identifiers have been scrubbed and replaced by numeric placeholders. In this work, we show that relational structure is sufficient for reidentifying many of the artists and genres in the taxonomy data set.

1. Introduction

The data for the KDD Cup 2011 competition are drawn from a real-world set of popular music reviews. Included in the data is an “item taxonomy”, which describes the relationship between four musical item types (artists, albums, tracks, and genres). To protect the data, item identifiers have been removed. According to the official contest website¹, the items “are represented as meaningless anonymous numbers so that no identifying information is revealed.” However, given the rich relational structure of the data, it is possible to reidentify much of the taxonomy data by matching it with publicly available Yahoo! Music² data.

For example, consider Artist 197656 from the Track 1 data. This artist has eight albums described by different combinations of ten genres. Each album is associated with several tracks, with track counts ranging from 1 to 69. We make the assumption that these albums and tracks were sampled without replacement from the discography of some real artist on the Yahoo! Music website. Furthermore, we assume that the connections between genres and albums are not sampled; that is, if an album in the KDD Cup dataset is attached to three genres, its real-world counterpart has exactly three genres (or “Categories”, as they are known on the Yahoo! Music site).

Under the above assumptions, we can compare the unlabeled KDD Cup artist with real-world Yahoo! Music artists in order to find a suitable match. The band Fischer Z, for example, is an unsuitable match, as their online discography only contains seven albums. An artist such as Meatloaf certainly has enough albums (56) to be a match, but none of those albums contain more than 31 tracks. The entry for Elvis Presley contains 109 albums, 17 of which boast 69 or more tracks; however, there is no consistent assignment of genres that satisfies our assumptions. The band Tool, however, is compatible with Artist 197656. The Tool discography contains 19 albums containing between 0 and 69 tracks. These albums are described by exactly 10 genres, which can be assigned to the unlabeled KDD Cup genres in a consistent manner. Furthermore, the match is unique: of the 134k artists in our labeled dataset, Tool is the only suitable match for Artist 197656. The album mapping between the two can be seen in Figure 1.

Once we have identified the artist, we are able to use the album, track and genre counts to reidentify the genres themselves. In this example, four of the ten genres can be uniquely labeled (157804↔“Mood Swing”, 280686↔“1990s Alternative”, 532850↔“Big Hits Of The '90s”, 622158↔“1990s Rock”). The remaining genres cannot be disambiguated without additional information; for example, “Metal” and “Rock” only appear together, and therefore are indistinguishable.

For this work, we focused on programmatically identifying KDD Cup artists and genres by matching them to data available from Yahoo! Music. Below, we present a brief description of our methods for reidentification, and outline techniques for evaluating accuracy in the absence of ground truth.

Note that we ignore the user rating data made available for the contest entirely, and thus did not perform any matching on users. Since labeled user ratings are not publicly available, we doubt that any such matching is possible, even with a perfectly reidentified taxonomy.

2. Reidentification

2.1. The Data Sets

The anonymized taxonomy data set from Track 1 was matched against a labeled data set downloaded from the Yahoo! Music website, using a combination of “screen scraping” and the Yahoo! Query Language API³. The labeled data contains 958k albums associated with 134k artists. When matching, we focused on prolific artists only and disregarded artists with fewer than five associated albums. With this restriction, the Track 1 and 2 taxonomies are made up of 3,716 and 2,237 artists, respectively, and are matched against 46,754 labeled artists from Yahoo! Music.

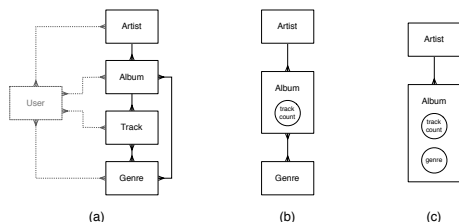

Figure 2. (a) Data schemata for the 2011 KDD Cup contest. In order to reidentify albums and genres, the data is transformed to a form that matches publicly available data on Yahoo! Music (b). Alternatively, genre items can be represented as attributes rather than entities (c). Note that user review information is ignored entirely.

The schema for the contest data can be found in Figure 2a. Since track-specific genre information was not available for the labeled data, we only consider the tracks as an aggregate count when matching; the data schema for the transformed taxonomy data (as well as the labeled Yahoo! Music data) can be seen in Figure 2b. Where convenient, the genre information can be represented as an attribute rather than an entity as in Figure 2c; this form matches the one illustrated in Figure 1.

2.2. Match Filtering

The goal of the match filtering procedure is to reduce the space of possible artist matches as much as possible. Ultimately, we match KDD Cup artists with their labeled counterparts by formulating the task as a constraint-based subgraph isomorphism problem (). However, in order to cut down the search space and reduce computation time, we perform several passes on the data, filtering out potential matches by employing heuristics of increasing complexity on each pass.

In the first phase, potential artist matches are filtered using album and track counts alone. For each labeled and unlabeled artist, an album and track “signature” is calculated. The signature consists of the track count for each album, sorted in descending order. To determine compatibility from the signatures, we use the following function, where $S_{kdd} = (k_0, k_1, \dots, k_n)$ is a KDD Cup artist signature and $S_{yah} = (y_0, y_1, \dots, y_m)$ is a Yahoo! Music artist signature.

function SignatureCompatibility( $S_{kdd}, S_{yah}$ )
  if  $m > n$  then return False
  end if
  for  $i = 0$  to  $n$  do if  $k_i > y_i$  then return False
    end if end for return True end function

For example, the signature for Track 1 Artist 197656 (illustrated in Figure 1) is (69, 69, 15, 13, 11, 6, 8, 1), while the signature for the band Tool is (69, 69, 15, 13, 12, 11, 9, 8, 6, 3, 3, 3, 3, 1, 1, 0, 0, 0, 0). By the above function, the two are compatible.

The second phase uses genre information to filter potential matches. For each artist, albums are divided into strata based on the number of genres associated with them. Track count signatures are calculated for each stratum, and match compatibility is determined by checking album track count compatibility for corresponding strata. For the above example, the strata for Artist 197656 are $\{ S_7 = (69, 15), S_6 = (8), S_5 = (69, 13), S_4 = (6, 1), S_1 = (11) \}$; for Tool, they are $\{ S_{10} = (8, 3, 3, 3, 1, 0, 0, 0), S_7 = (69, 15), S_6 = (12), S_5 = (69, 13), S_4 = (6, 1), S_1 = (11), S_0 = (9, 3, 0) \}$. Again, the two are compatible.

The final phase of the matching process considers a pair of artists as a subgraph isomorphism constraint satisfaction problem, formulated in a similar vein to the work presented by Zampelli et al. (2010), where albums and genres are matched simultaneously. However, for artists with hundreds of albums and several categories, solving several thousand constraint satisfaction problems can become infeasible. To speed up computation, we again stratify the albums into groups; however, here we use the actual set of genres to define each stratum rather than genre counts. Figure 3 depicts the discography of the band Tool stratified in this manner. Using this representation, we can perform the constraint based matching on the strata rather than individual albums. The computational savings from this approach can be significant: For example, the band Led Zeppelin has 112 albums associated with it; when stratified by genre sets, these albums form only 8 strata.

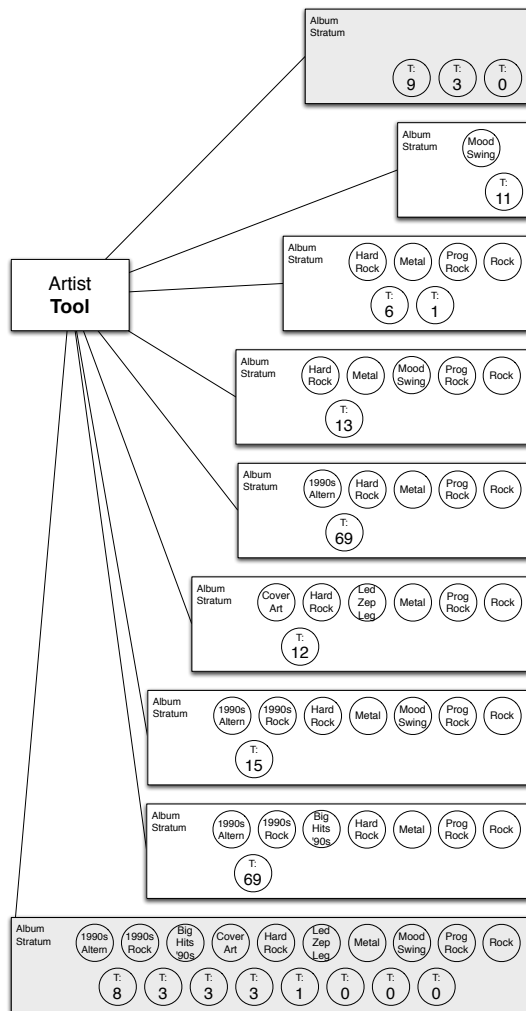

Figure 3. Discography for the band Tool stratified by genre sets. By matching on genre-based strata rather than individual albums, the computational burden is reduced.

2.3. Artist and Genre Matching

Once the set of possible artist matches has been adequately filtered, we can perform the final matching. First, each potential match consisting of an unlabeled KDD Cup artist k and Yahoo! Music artist y are scored using the following attributes, in descending order of importance (lower scores are better for attributes with a “-” symbol):

- k -degree (# of potential matches for k)
- y -degree (# of potential matches for y)
- # of previously matched genres (initially 0 for all potential artist matches)
- # of new genre matches provided by this match
- # of genres that will remain unmatched by this match
- # of genres for k
- # of genres for y
- # of albums for k
- # of albums for y
- # of genre strata for k
- # of genre strata for y

As a preliminary step, we “seed” the matching process (Narayanan et al., 2011) by identifying easily matched genres. After scoring all possible artist matches according to the above criteria, we identify the subset of potential matches for which k -degree and y -degree are 1. For each, we identify the genre matches that are unambiguously identified using constraint satisfaction. Genres that were unanimously identified by five or more k , y pairs are recorded as a match. This step greatly cuts down on the search space by further filtering the list of potential matches for the remaining KDD Cup artists.

The algorithm for matching can be shown below. Once all potential matches have been scored and seed genres identified, the algorithm proceeds by selecting the top scoring artist match, storing it, and updating (or possibly deleting) the remaining potential artist matches.

As the algorithm continues, the list of matched genres grows, raising the score (or possibly disqualifying) the remaining potential artist matches. As an added safeguard against cascades of errors, we instituted a threshold t for genre matches, where only genres that have been successfully matched by at least t artist pairs are used for re-scoring (for this work, we used a value of $t = 2$).

3. Evaluation

Since we do not have access to ground truth, evaluating the quality of our artist and genre matching is difficult. Below, we offer some evidence that our results are accurate.

3.1. Sampled Data

We created several “synthetic” unlabeled data sets by sampling directly from the labeled Yahoo! Music data

Algorithm 1 Artist / Genre Matching

Input: set of scored potential artist matches $M = \{(k_0, y_0, score_0), (k_1, y_1, score_1), \dots\}$, where $k \in$ KDD Cup artists, $y \in$ Yahoo! Music artists

$match_{art} \leftarrow \emptyset$

$match_{gen} \leftarrow \emptyset$

while $|M| > 0$ do

$k, y \leftarrow$ highest scoring match in M

$g \leftarrow$ new genre matches

$match_{art} \leftarrow match_{art} \cup (k, y)$

$match_{gen} \leftarrow match_{gen} \cup g$

for all $m' = k', y' \in M$ do

if $k' = k$ or $y' = y$ then

$M \leftarrow M \setminus \{m'\}$

else

 re-score m' with updated $match_{gen}$

end if

end for

end while

and “anonymizing” them by removing identifiers. By running the matching algorithm on these data sets, we can gauge its accuracy. Of course, there is no guarantee that our sampling procedure is identical to the one used by the contest creators; even so, we feel that success using these “synthetic” is strong evidence in support of our results on the actual KDD Cup data set.

Table 1 lists the top- n accuracy for artist reidentification on the sampled data, averaged over 10 samples. In each case, we matched only artists with at least 5 albums and one associated genre, with an average of 4,542 artists comprising each sample. When all matches are considered, the overall accuracy is 62%. However, for the higher-scoring matches, the accuracy is much greater: for all 10 samples, the top 1000 matches are 100% correct.

Table 1. Top- n accuracy for sampled Yahoo! Music data, averaged over 10 data sets. Each data set consists of sampled artists with at least five albums and one genre, with an average of 4,542 artists included in each.

n	ACCURACY	STD DEV
1000	1.0000	0.0000
2000	0.9998	0.0003
3000	0.9010	0.0073
4000	0.7042	0.0065
ALL	0.6231	0.0063

For genre matching, the accuracy was consistently perfect: the sampled data sets contained an average of 176 album genres, and the matching procedure reidentified them perfectly in all 10 samples.

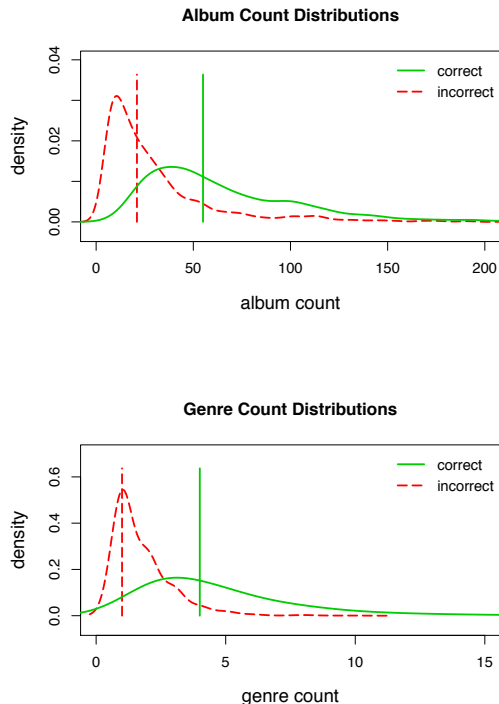

Figure 4. Album (top) and genre (bottom) count distributions for correctly and incorrectly reidentified artists (vertical lines indicate the mean value of each distribution). Artists with less relational structure (few albums and genres) make up the majority of the errors.

As expected, reidentification is less difficult for artists with high album and genre counts. Figure 4 depicts the album and genre count distributions for correctly and incorrectly identified artists.

3.2. KDD Cup Data

Since ground truth is unavailable, evaluation of our reidentification technique on the actual KDD Cup contest data is difficult. However, by comparing aggregate properties of the labeled and unlabeled data, we can gauge the reasonableness of our matches. Figure 5 shows a frequency distribution for album genres in the labeled Yahoo! Music data, compared with the frequency for the matched contest genres. With few exceptions, the relative frequencies of each genre are directionally correct when compared with their labeled counterparts.

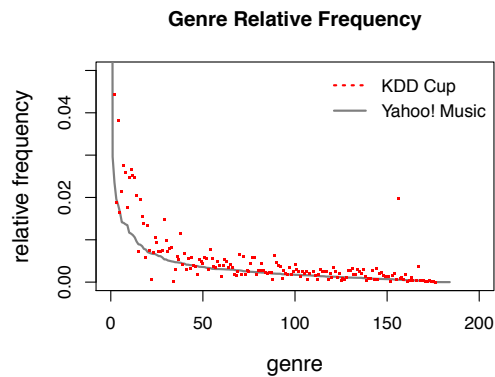

Figure 5. Relative frequency distributions for album genres. The solid line depicts the frequency of each Yahoo! Music album genre, arranged in descending order. The dots represent the frequency of their KDD Cup Track 1 counterparts relative to the unlabeled contest data.

Figure 3.2 depicts the album count for matched pairs of labeled and unlabeled artists. The r-square value for labeled and unlabeled album counts is 0.47.

4. Conclusion

Data privacy in networks is a growing area of study in the knowledge discovery community. Despite the removal of explicit identifiers, “anonymized” data with rich relational structure can often be reidentified (Hay et al., 2008). In this work, we demonstrate a technique for automated structural reidentification using the KDD Cup data set (the full result set can be found in Appendix A⁴). Although it is impossible to evaluate our methods directly we have demonstrated its effectiveness on samples taken from the labeled data.

Certainly, the success of our technique hinges on the validity of our assumptions. First, we assume that the contest artists, albums, and tracks are sampled without replacement from the full data set. Second, we assume that genres are not sampled, but are mapped directly. If either of these assumptions are incorrect our results are most likely inaccurate. Conversely, by explicitly breaking these assumptions, future network data sets may be able to avoid reidentification using the techniques described here.
